From My Heart...

When our children were small, I learned a lot about being a parent. But then, as they got older, I began to forget what it was like to have young children around the house. But now, with grandchildren, I have begun learning those lessons all over again.

It's easy to be proud of our grandchildren. We see them with their little angelic faces, their bright smiles, sharing their toys and saying "please" and "thank you." When you go visiting and they see you they come running, throwing their arms around you. You pick them up, and they hug you, and tell you how much they love you. Those are precious moments, when you wish you could stop the clock and cherish them like that forever and ever.

In such moments, Becky and I look at each other and think, "They're just like little angels." And we notice similarities between them and us, traits that we recognize in one another. We say, "Why, that is just like you," or "Yep, another chip off the old block."

There are other moments, moments when they have temper tantrums and go marching across the floor screaming, "No!" and "Mine!" defying discipline; moments when they're angry, selfish and won't share. In moments like that, we look at each other and think, "They're just like little devils, aren't they?" And we note the similarities between them and some of our other relatives.

The point is, in each little precious child there is both a devil and an angel. And they're not alone. Everybody has those same two natures.

Every one of us has the capability of displaying a spirit of generosity and kindness and goodness. There are moments when we would climb the highest mountain and wade the deepest streams, go to the ends of the world to help each other. There are moments when we are almost like angels.

Then there are other moments when we are hateful and hostile and greedy. There are moments when it is hard to find anything good in us; when we look like, and sound like, and act like devils. And in each of us are those two diverse natures.

Paul is saying in the midst of all this, we can live in victory. We don't have to live in defeat, frustration, and depression. That's good news!
